Tecum'Seh,
Crow Sachem 44pt

We were but five, but we were invincible. How could the swords of those-who-carry-steel touch us when we are led by Tecum'Seh ? As tall as two humans, his willowy body moved like the wind. When he fought, his attacks were a deadly aerial ballet of such grace and harmony that he seemed inspired by Koga himself.

Medicine Shaman (1) 37pt

Empathy :
As long as a friendly Aurlok is within 6 inches of the Medicine Shaman, he can prevent 1 point of damage per attack. The Shaman takes the damage instead. This ability cannot be used if the shaman has only one hit point left. Taking damage by using this ability does not reduce the focus level of the shaman.

He patiently skimmed the bushes, looking for the components he needed to prepare his medicines. How was he able to ignore the combat raging around him? Perhaps the only thing he could hear was Walosi's voice.

The four silhouettes moved in complete silence, the screeching of the crows covering their advance. It was impossible to know if these Crow Thunder-Warriors had used the diversion created by their totem or if were somehow the cause of it... Whatever the case, they managed to close with their enemies without being noticed. By the time they realized they were under attack, it was too late.

Auroch Totem-Warrior (2)

Sitting quietly on a blanket, lovingly holding a baby Aurlok in his enormous hands, he listened to the story of the Shaman. His face was illuminated with a blissful smile and his eyes glittered with admiration as the shaman told the stories of ancient Aurlok heroes. Seeing him with such child-like passion, who could think this Aurlok Totem-Warrior was such a dangerous enemy; as solid as a rock and as powerful as an Auroch? His tenderness goes to his tribe, while his fury goes to his enemies. Tomorrow the Avalonian warriors would see the truth of this.

As they struggled to cross the plain, young Ghauvin noticed atop a distant hill what he feared most: lean, agile silhouettes that could only be Wolf Thunder-warriors, scanning the Avalonian column with their keen, cunning eyes. The novice swallowed with difficulty, he knew these silhouettes meant attacks on the column were imminent; deaths of sentries during the night or ambushes on the road. These swift, ferocious warriors were hunting in packs, just like their animal totem, and would restlessly harry their prey until the moment of the kill.
